Political leaders must do more to ensure gender balance

The results of the European Parliament mid-term elections last week reveal that this institution still has a long way to go for gender parity. As you pointed out in your editorial last week ("Parliament fails the gender test", 19-25 January), the Parliament will once again be chaired by a man, and the number of women among its vice-presidents (only three out of 14) has dropped to the level of 2004, undermining the progress made in recent years.

In 2009, European voters sent a clear message in support of parity democracy: the number of women MEPs increased by five percentage points, to 35%. Two and half years later, the unwillingness of the political groups of the Parliament to do their share, by ensuring the election of women in internal leadership posts, means that this message has not been heard.

EUROPEAN PARLIAMENT 35% are women, but few make it to the top. EP

The backlash on parity democracy in the Parliament is worrying, as the EU decision-making bodies need democracy and transparency more than ever. Citizens' trust in the capacity of these institutions to listen to their voices is fading, and economic and social challenges will not be solved to the benefit of all women and men if decision-making bodies are not representative of their concerns.

The European elections in 2014 are the next opportunity for our political leaders to get the gender balance right. For this to happen, political parties must ensure that women and men are equally placed in national electoral lists.

The political groups of the Parliament must, in their turn, commit themselves to putting up both women and men as candidates for internal leadership posts. Finally, the debate on binding measures for gender balance within European institutions needs to be reopened, now.

Where are the Socialist women in leading posts?

You wrote last week in your editorial that women are poorly represented in senior positions in the European Parliament ("Parliament fails the gender test," 19-25 January).

In the Parliament's women's committee we have adopted several resolutions calling for targets and quotas for women in industry's top jobs.

Although I would naturally like to see more women occupying such posts, I believe that quotas denigrate the role of women in the workplace. I and the group to which I belong, the European Conservatives and Reformists, have often been attacked by Socialists for this position. Given the left's strength of feeling on the matter, I would have expected Martin Schulz – until recently, the leader of the Socialist grouping – to have seized the opportunity presented by his election to the presidency of the Parliament, by placing some women at the top of his cabinet, staff personally appointed by him.

Unfortunately, a glance down the list of his special advisers shows that he is not practising what his group has preached for all these years. Men hold all of the top jobs, including the posts of head and deputy head of cabinet and spokesperson. There are far more men in senior positions than women, and overwhelmingly more women in assistant positions than men.

The Socialists may like to remember this the next time they get on their high horse.

Corrections

• A book review of "Why leaders lie" ("For the people, despite the people," 12-18 January) suggested that the decision to name and shame the worst managers of EU money was made by the European Court of Auditors. The decision was made by the European Commission.

• Martin Schulz's bookshop ("A presidential welcome", Entre Nous 19-25 January) is in Würselen.

Little sign of weakness

The comment piece entitled "A weaker Commission?" (19-25 January) requires a response.

The report of the launch of "The future of Europe: towards a two-speed EU?", the book by Jean-Claude Piris, the former head of the Council of Ministers' legal service, is an accurate account of the panel discussion that accompanied the event. However, the ensuing commentary on the European Commission is indicative of the kind of flabby analysis that seems to have invaded the Brussels beltway of late.

To his credit, the author, Tim King, singles out the Commission's work on the debt crisis and the action it is taking to uphold European values in Hungary, and implies that it would be churlish not to recognise these initiatives. Yet he descends into attacks on individual commissioners without substantive facts or argument.

There has been a plethora of attacks on European institutions in recent times, and the Commission has borne the brunt of them. In the face of this onslaught, the Commission has been getting on with doing the job expected of it: as the main architect of the new architecture of the economic and monetary union, in the forefront of offering innovative solutions to the unprecedented crisis we face and through economic task-forces to assist member states recover growth. It is working more closely than ever before with members of the European Parliament to ensure a genuine European response to our significant problems.

It is paradoxical that the Commission is being accused of institutional weakness at a time when the community method is being validated and when the Commission is acquiring new, significant competencies in economic governance.

I think it is reasonable to assert that the Barroso II college of commissioners is navigating in the most turbulent waters of European integration ever. We live in unpreceded times and comparisons with a supposed Commission 'golden age' in days gone by are fatuous. The Commission is required to lead in a number of fundamental areas. It proposes legislation, it is the guarantor of the Community interest, it upholds European values and it is the defender erga omnes of the Community method. Small states in the EU look to the Commission to secure their interests. Citizens, businesses and regions count on the Commission to invest in Europe's future through the Community budget.

In all these areas and more, the Commission – and all of its members – are delivering. No institution is perfect and all who serve the European interest in current circumstances need to be accountable for the decisions they take. Perhaps, therefore, some in the Brussels beltway might do well to listen to the words of a former Brazilian president, Luiz Inácio Lula da Silva, who declared that "Brussels" is an anchor of reason in today's crazy world.

Self-flagellation by Brussels insiders is sad and unfair. Exceptional times call for exceptional responses. History will, I believe, record that it was the Commission during this time that decisively and skilfully contributed to navigate the ship to safer waters. This story ain't over yet.
